Rockefeller Global Leadership Program

We seek “to educate, train, and inspire the next generation of leaders in all endeavors”

What is RGLP?

The Rockefeller Global Leadership Program (RGLP) is a one-term program that prepares Dartmouth students to work in a global environment in which ideas, capital and people move freely across borders. In this global environment, close collaboration is critical in order to address the most pressing issues facing our society.

Leaders in this fluid network need a variety of tools to successfully navigate professional and interpersonal situations, namely: cultural understanding, flexibility, communication skills, and an ability to fully utilize technology that brings us face to face with people who share our goals – but maybe not our culture, world view or communication style. Through various activities, in-depth discussions, and a weekend learning experience in either Montreal, Boston, or NYC students will become equipped with the aforementioned skills vital to their success.

Learning Objectives

- Improve intercultural communication
- Develop cross-cultural understanding
- Enhance critical and analytical thinking skills within a global framework
- Develop a global consciousness
- Increase appreciation of diversity, especially within a team setting

Eligibility and Selection

RGLP is offered every fall, winter, spring term. All first-year students, sophomores, juniors, and seniors are invited to apply any time during the academic year but students must note the deadlines at the end of each application cycle.

The selection process involves reviewing the applications and interviewing candidates. While participation in the Management and Leadership Development Program (MLDP) is not a pre-requisite, completion of MLDP will strongly increase a candidate's chances of being accepted into the program.
